WHAT DOES THIS LOOK LIKE?

1. Mini Project: Three artists will be studied as a group, a painter, a pattern artist and a mixed media artist. After studying their processes individually, students develop ideas for a final piece to show their learning. This final piece will combine the subject matter/materials/processes/meaning of the artists, together with the student's own creative voice.

WHY? - Covers assessment objective of course
- Introduces each element needed to pass the course

Introduces students to three very different ways of working

- Allows students to make mistakes without the pressure of having to submit the work my reaction on my ideas has helped me come to an idea for my final piece. I plan to create an oil painting of my younger sister in the style of Jane French surrounded in a collage of pink flowers.

experimentation.

I began by experimenting with how I could make a nice background. This I knew I wanted to use a collage of pink flowers (roses and lilies) so I began sticking flowers I saved from a magazine onto my page.

I also layered on pink flowers I cut out of paper as well as pieces of tissue paper to experiment with texture. I like the result of this however I realised that all when I intended to use for the portrait does not work well on top.

I like the appearance of the glossy paper

As while I was painting my friend in the style of Jane French I struggled to properly do the nose, and found it blended into the cheek so I have experimented using pencil.

I created 8 observational drawings of noses to understand more accurately how the shadows hit a nose so there is more definition for my final response

I experimented with the background again this time I found my pictures on Pinterest and printed them out onto some glossy paper however I found that the paper wasn't too see through which meant they all bled together which I did not like so in my final piece I intend to use images from magazines. To replicate my final piece I used a canvas board which was easel and began to paint atop. Although the paint stuck I did not like painting on top of the pink or on top of the texture so in my final piece I will avoid the area I want to paint atop of. I also used glitter glue that is pink which I want to carry forward as I think it made the background more cohesive and it matches the idea of femininity.

Intentions.

I intend to create a large oil painting of my sister's head in the style of Jane French taking inspiration from the way she pushed colour as I intend to use more pinky warm tones than in the reference to express femininity. I am also going to draw on Jane French's use of blocks and method of working from light to dark. From Naomi Vona I am really inspired by her use of magazines so I intend to cut out pink roses and lilies from magazines and glue some them to my canvas using glitter glue. Brian Huntress's use of mixed media also inspired the background as I want it to appear over whelming and chaotic like his work.

LINNEA STRID.

Linnea Strid is a Swedish realist artist. She primarily paints water and people surrounded by water. She has created four pieces in a series called "The Drowning Artist" in which she paints herself in the bath, with her face partially or completely submerged under water. Her face is always obscured or distorted in some way by the water, creating a kind of abstraction to the pieces.

PROCESS OF PAINTING:

Linnea Strid begins with a simple, well-outlined sketch of major facial features, such as the eyes, mouth, and nose. She begins by painting from one of these areas, using photo reference, and carries on outward across the face. She does not use blue and instead paints the mixed colours directly onto the canvas. She completes the painting and then begins moving on. She many times to create something bland.

WHY HAVE I CHOSEN THIS ARTIST?

It feels like a natural progression from Aida Weston's water paintings to move onto another artist who sees the flowing form of this subject matter along with its varying colour. However, considering where I want this project to go, I have decided to write water with self-portraiture to fulfil my intentions. I decided, after completing Watson, to reflect on my entire project so far, laying out all the pieces of work I have created. This was incredibly helpful, being able to visualise the journey I have gone through so far and having the opportunity to identify underlying themes in my work which can inspire me going forward. It's realised, especially after the Migrant piece, that I intend for the piece I create at the end of the project to be self-portraiture, but it will be obscured or distorted in some way. I will never be truly seen as I am in real life. This incorporates my interest in Surrealism as I will be depicting reality (i.e. myself) but with a twist which makes the work eerie, strange or disquieting.

OPRO PHOTOS

I took these photos myself using a waterproof camera. I had difficulty taking the photos while also trying to pose for them, so I will not be using them for this artist.

THINKING AHEAD

I also chose to take photos of myself underwater which I could use later on in my final piece. These images don't relate to this current artist but I may refer back to them later on in the project.

I used two different grey pens (with thicknesses of 0.2 and 0.5mm). For the darkest of black, using grey for all the other areas. This decision made these features stand out more. However, it did cause me to have difficulty with the multitude of shades in the rest of the piece. I had to use a certain area darker, such as the space where the nose meets the chin. On the one used in the watercolour piece, as it slightly obscures my face but makes my specific part of the main focus of my final piece will be self-portraiture, so to a certain degree people who looked at the final piece said they didn't think it looked like me. When I show it to ripples. For instance, my hair is much darker in the water. However, it is still me in the water. I want to explore further. This piece was created on cartridge paper. I used the same method as the oil on a larger scale than my previous two experiments. With this experiment, I will use a thin dish of working.

Can't help myself

By Sun Yuan and Peng Yu

Sun Yuan and Peng Yu both studied oil painting at the Central Academy of Fine Arts, Beijing. They began collaborating in the 2000s and used art to comment critically on political constructs, freedom, and democracy. Their large-scale installations spark controversy for using human and animal material when opposing political activity and moral boundaries.

'Can't help myself', the piece I want to look at, is an installation that was revealed to the public in 2016. They modified a robotic arm, which is often used in car manufacturing, by adding a shovel to the end of the mechanism. Yuan and Yu had designed different movements for the machine to mimic the normal movements of a human. Some examples they had labeled are "scratch an itch," and "bow and shake,"<sup>1</sup>. They isolate the machine from the public by an acrylic partition. The machine was then surrounded in animal blood, which the machine attempts to sweep inwards.

I chose to research this machine due to its movements: The artist's humanized the machine through the robot's erratic gestures and it appears to be struggling to scoop the animal blood towards itself. This can be seen through the abrupt spins and flails breaking up, and in contrast to, the machines controlled, rhythmic engineered movements. The spins interrupt a series of slow melancholic movements to show how the machine is getting bored and frustrated with its lack of progress. There is a sense of desperation and hopelessness as it is trying to clean up its mess but as it turns its attention away, the blood just seeps back. It is almost trapped in a cycle with no progress.

Key Elements

The colours used are similar in tone to imply consistency. All colours are also realistic (the sky is blue, and the brick is stone as it would be at the time).

The sky is in 3 distinct layers of colour, again keeping in line with the structured architecture within the painting.

The city itself is imaginary. The main, thought to be religious, building at the centre, with the other buildings located around it in the distance. The central monument resembles a historical site called Tempio S. Pietro, located in Rome.

The painting includes no people and no nature—the focus is solely on the perfection of the structural aspects of the city. This is emphasized by the empty plinths. That would usually adorn a statue. This adds to the emptiness of the city, making it feel vast and abandoned, even though it looks new.

The painting reflects the ideals of Renaissance artists as they used Roman monuments as influences for their paintings and architecture.

Artistic Elements

The whole painting is symmetrical vertically, a mirror line can be drawn directly down the centre of the central building on both sides would be completely symmetrical. The only difference being the heights of the buildings in the very back that disappear into the horizon line. This creates balance.

The door of the main building is the vanishing point, with all lines leading to it. This door is also slightly ajar, creating darkness - emphasising the vanishing point.

A sense of depth and space are created within the painting, due to the use of one point perspective. The buildings go back into the distance, giving the illusion of a three-dimensional space—adding to the realism.

The central building is in the shape of concentric circles and its peak is the central point of the painting.

her in this state of stillness. With nothing beyond, the viewer gets the sense that nature is suffocating Ophelia and although she appears to be looking at the sky, really, she sees nothing, because she is dead.

Her facial expression isn't one of happiness, but it isn't pain or sadness either. She's waiting for death to release her.

Ophelia's hands are reaching up and are open. In my opinion, there is a religious tone to this. Jesus is often painted with his arms outstretched towards Heaven. In Crucifixion paintings, Jesus' arms are spread and he is looking up at the sky, accepting his fate and awaiting God. Ophelia also has her arms reaching out, upwards, despite the fact that she is described as being pulled under the water. Milton is suggesting, through her pose, that Ophelia is accepting of her fate and even welcoming of it, which fits with the context of this being her suicide. We can almost picture her hopes of peace that come with death, similar to Jesus' peace in Heaven after a life of persecution.

COMPOSITION

The strength of nature is exemplified in the painting through the use of the Golden Ratio and Rule of Thirds. The backdrop of trees and bushes curve around the piece towards the front left side of the composition. Ophelia's face rests just above the centre of the Golden Ratio, drawing the viewer's attention immediately to her and her story. Nature is everywhere and it guides the eye, as if the forest has allowed them to witness Ophelia's death.

The cover of nature is broken up by the water travelling through the middle and bottom thirds at a slight angle. Ophelia's dress straddles the centre and bottom thirds, travelling along the horizontal bottom third line. The bulk of the foliage is placed in the top and bottom thirds, (horizontally) allowing the painting to feel encompassed by nature while still retaining a distinctive portraiture and storytelling aspect in and at the centre.

The river banks on either side of Ophelia form leading lines, guiding the viewer to create a sense of flow and movement as she floats parallel to them.

OPHELIA AND WATER

The water itself is personified by Queen Gertrude as being the killer of Ophelia, making her dress so heavy that it pulled her under. If she was alive there would be some kind of movement or rippling. Water is a part of nature, but the fact that it has no movement symbolises that death is present in the scene. Ophelia is being carried and almost supported by the river, while its ultimate purpose is to end her suffering. In the most obvious way, the water is the killer. However, in the romantic mood of the painting, water is her saviour/means of escape.

This piece<sup>2</sup> is a little different and doesn't have as many obvious contrasts. The woman in the artwork appears to be experiencing domestic abuse: others see a happy loving relationship as he gives her flowers, but behind closed doors he is punching her which she has sadly become numb to. This makes me feel helplessness as I feel like the woman and I are defenceless and unable to react. The male arm in the piece is a vivid orange tone which is the same colour as the hair of the victim, yet her skin tone is ghostly and white which could represent the vulnerability and powerlessness she has. The use of the same orange tones of the arm and hair could represent the control he has over her. The black clothing also could represent the lifelessness she feels as it appears she is dressed for a funeral. The composition of this piece is a straight horizontal line which passes through the middle of the image. The arm, moving into the flowers flying out of the original bunch, and the hair, create movement from the right of the piece to the left. This could show the power and motion of his strength when abusing her as we follow the male arm across the piece until it reaches her face. I feel like this piece represents domestic abuse and how the female in the digital painting is expected to take it and how, on the surface to anyone else, the relationship would seem loving symbolised through the roses. The powerful physicality of the horizontal gesture is disguised and masked by the flowers - this is power and fragility, dominance and submission. The removal of the eyes, for me, emphasises this further as the woman's identity is hidden. The use of colour affirms the muted identity of the female whilst reminding the viewer of her previous life and passion through the colour of her hair.

Frida Kahlo was a Mexican artist whose main form of work was paintings, out of the 143 works, 55 were self-portraits. The themes she based on her work on was her own personal experiences including marriage, miscarriage and the operations she underwent from many different diseases she caught as a child and growing up. Ultimately, she was depicting the pain that she experienced throughout her whole life and career. Her work is affiliated with many different art movements including surrealism, magical surrealism, symbolism and modern art. Some influences for her work were surrealism and Diego Rivera. Kahlo admired Rivera and his work and eventually married him in 1929.

This artwork that she created was a part of the naive art period which means simple and unaffected. This piece was made in 1940 and titled 'Self-portrait with thorn necklace and hummingbird'. My initial thoughts about this piece was that Kahlo was trying to send a message that she was unaffected by her divorce and the end of her affair which happened around this time, that she was calm and unbothered by these events. However, after researching the meanings behind this work and gaining understanding of the thorn necklace and the hummingbird both juxtaposing each other, I strongly believe that she is trying to say that she is in pain and hurting. This continues to follow the dark themes in her work. She also is comforting herself by using the hummingbird as symbolism for good luck. Kahlo is portraying herself as how she wants to be in the future but also presently that her current feelings are almost a weight keeping her down. The thorn necklace could further support her suffering as it can be seen as religious imagery taken from Jesus' death and the crown of thorns.
